

Cyrus Farivar &lt;cyrus.farivar@arstechnica.com&gt;

---

NYT piece tonight

---

Katy Dorner <dormer@fb.com>
To: Cyrus Farivar <cyrus.farivar@arstechnica.com>

Tue, Dec 18, 2018 at 8:02 PM

Hi Cyrus,

Below please find our two comments on the nyt story. We are not providing the documents referenced in the story.
Thanks.

—Katy

“Facebook’s partners don’t get to ignore people’s privacy settings, and it’s wrong to suggest that they do. Over the years, we’ve partnered with other companies so people can use Facebook on devices and platforms that we don’t support ourselves. Unlike a game, streaming music service, or other third-party app, which offer experiences that are independent of Facebook, these partners can only offer specific Facebook features and are unable to use information for independent purposes.” — Steve Satterfield, Director of Privacy and Public Policy at Facebook

“We know we’ve got work to do to regain people’s trust. Protecting people’s information requires stronger teams, better technology, and clearer policies, and that’s where we’ve been focused for most of 2018. Partnerships are one area of focus and, as we’ve said, we’re winding down the integration partnerships that were built to help people access Facebook.” — Steve Satterfield, Director of Privacy and Public Policy at Facebook

[Quoted text hidden]